Okay, so, it's true that in the "In a Nutshell" section Shmoop pointed out that A Christmas Carol came out just in time to capitalize on all the Christmas hype going around. But in reality? With this one little book that was so wildly popular that seven (!) editions of the thing had sold out before six months passed, Dickens pretty much invented modern Christmas as we know it.

Now, for those of you who watched Carol on TCM, did you hear that piece during the movie? Neither did I. And this is a mystery. I'd figured the theme would have been used for either the opening or closing credit scene; instead, for each we were given a series of Christmas carols by a children's choir.
